Learn how the ethics codes of the American Psychological Association and other groups (Society for Human Resource Management and the American Counseling Association) can guide decision-making and communication in human resource management and mental health service delivery settings. The codes can function as both “sword and shield” in protecting the rights of clients and defending the actions of the practitioner.

This workshop is appropriate for human services professionals who deal with confidential client information and/or testing and assessment issues in the workplace. It will be team-taught by a clinical and an industrial/organizational psychologist in an interactive format using case studies from both disciplines.

Objectives

1. To recognize common ethical dilemmas related to client confidentiality, testing and assessment, and competence in both organizational and mental health settings.
2. To describe appropriate ethical standards such as the APA Code of Ethics for ethical dilemmas in these domains.
3. To be able to utilize ethical standards such as the APA Code of Ethics to analyze these ethical dilemmas.
4. To be able to address these ethical dilemmas that arise in both organizational and mental health settings.
